What’s in Your Junk Drawer?

Hanoch Piven has turned that answer into art. In his forthcoming children’s book, that means a postcard body for Abraham and a whistle nose for Esther.

Hanoch Piven’s art likely looks familiar. His portraits, crafted with everyday objects—think light bulbs for noses, seashells for eyes, and Mattzah for beards—have been featured in the Atlantic, the New Yorker, and Esquire, among other publications. He’s gained such fame that people often give him bags of junk for his art. “They are proud when you see, you need to observe, be present, pay attention, look for happy accidents. And you need to accept that you don’t know what you’re doing until something happens. There are a lot of life lessons in collage.

NS: How did your partnership with your coauthor Shira come about?
HP: In Yiddish, the word is beshert. A few years ago, I was invited to Camp Moshava in the Poconos (in Pennsylvania) as an artist in residence. After I gave a talk, Shira came to me and said she’d love it if I’d create a couple of illustrations of Bible characters. We met a couple weeks later, and I suggested combining some of the illustrations into a book. Shira then put me in touch with PJ Library. Two or three years later, when we were getting ready to show the book to publishers, Joy Peskin, an editor with Farrar, Straus and Giroux, asked, “Have you ever done books for children?” It’s just like collage: If you allow yourself to be open to happy accidents, they will come.

NS: What was your relationship with these biblical characters before you started working on this book, and how has it changed?
HP: My life is very secular. But after learning about the stories for this book, I’ve come to love them so much. I’m a searcher; I move from country to country. When I read the story of Abraham, how can I not think the writer knows something about my own spirit? Shira and I understood that we needed to find one educational value to take from each story. With Eve, it was to be curious. Ruth was about finding your people. Looking at these characters from a human point of view is a good tool for bringing these stories closer to kids. Sometimes kids may have their own understanding, like how much water was in the sea for Jonah and might need a time-out, and what better time-out could there be than three days in a fish’s belly?

NS: I bet many children (and grownups) will be inspired to re-create your art. Where should they start?
HP: Get a basket and go around your house and look at the things in a new way. Look at everything in the junk drawer and the recycling bin as potential for creativity. If you want to do a self-portrait (see sidebar) or re-create a character from the Bible, you can start with everyday objects that one might find around the house. Some of those objects are clues into a character’s personality or story. Why not create a self-portrait using objects around your home?

SUPPLIES

• Small random items (buttons, beads, scraps of paper, snippets of string or fabric, seashells, twigs, magazine clippings, pieces from board games, dried beans or rice—anything goes!)
• Glue (optional)
• Cardboard or heavy construction paper (optional)
• Your imagination

DIRECTIONS

Hunt around your house for small random items (like the ones in the list above). Place your collection in a pile on a table, then arrange the objects into a picture that reflects how you see yourself. If none of the objects in your portrait are things that you will need again (check with a grownup), consider gluing your artwork down onto a piece of cardboard or heavy construction paper.
